Rearden Commerce is transforming the "supply chain for services," with a services marketplace aimed at the size and scope of Amazon or eBay and the mission to fundamentally change the way businesses and consumers buy and sell services. More than 500,000 users at more than 200 companies have adopted the Rearden Commerce Network to provide better insight into, and management of, the services supply chain.

Centralizing purchases on a single platform, Rearden Commerce gives corporations unprecedented visibility and control over spend areas that have historically gone unmanaged. Rearden combines a web-based Personal Assistant that automatically finds, schedules and books the services employees need to get things done, with the world's largest online marketplace for all types of services. Rearden drives corporate savings by guiding users to preferred suppliers and negotiated rates; enables consumption of contracts through an easy-to-use experience for all services purchases; and facilitates switching, adding or moving market share to preferred suppliers.

Patrick Grady founded Rearden Commerce in 2000, and is a recognized pioneer in leveraging Service Oriented Architecture, XML and Software as a Service to transform e-commerce. Grady has been named to Fast Company Magazine's Fast 50 and was recently recognized by Business Travel News as one of the top 25 most influential people in the travel industry. Rearden Commerce has also been named to the 2007 Next Net 25 by Business 2.0 Magazine.
